NFL activates its exempt list for a second arrest this season, with punishment from the first still pending.

HOT MIC MOMENT

Mic's still live. The commissioner's exempt list has now processed two players this season carrying a felony charge and a strangulation arrest between them, and in both cases the league produced a roster transaction before it produced a finding. That is sequencing: the paperwork that returns a man to the field is moving faster than the paperwork that would ever keep him off it. A private commissioner's office is now outpacing the court system in both cases, and outpacing its own personal conduct policy too. Somebody on the assignment desk should be asking why league security can clear a roster spot before a court clears a docket. Get me the political desk.

Housing nonprofit backed by LA mayoral candidate can't account for $87 million in housing money

BY RUTH
The Money Desk

Eighty-seven million dollars is the size of the gap Los Angeles City Attorney Hydee Feldstein Soto wants closed. The gap sits inside a nonprofit called LAFLA, a group backed by mayoral candidate Nithya Raman. The money came from the city's "Mansion Tax" and was meant to build housing. The audit demand, reported October 16, does not say where the money went. It says the city does not know.

Start with the number itself. That qualifier is the first entry in the ledger: the city is not disputing a specific sum, it is disputing a ceiling. Eighty-seven million is the most the gap could be, which means the actual figure, whatever it turns out to be, has not been produced by anyone yet. An audit exists to find that number. As of this filing, no audit has finished.

Second entry: who asked. The request came from the city attorney's office, dated October 16 and 17. Nothing in that request makes Feldstein Soto a candidate for mayor, and nothing here calls her one. What the request does establish is narrower and harder to argue with: in a mayoral race where Raman's campaign has built part of its case on housing policy, the only math

Senators demand answers on throttled soldiers' Starlink; Musk answers with a flying car.

On Thursday, in Texas, Elon Musk's Tesla rolled the Roadster onto a runway, strapped it with the same high-pressure air thrusters SpaceX puts on its rockets, and had it flip and hover for a cheering crowd. CBS News filmed the acrobatics and then asked the follow-up the stage left out: who regulates this thing, on the road or off it? CBS put the question to the Department of Transportation that same afternoon. The outlet could only publish the question itself — no fuller answer has turned up since.

The day before, in Washington, a harder question was already sitting unanswered. Ukraine's access to Starshield, the military-grade branch of SpaceX's Starlink network, had been throttled, and President Zelenskyy said the slowdown disrupted drone operations and put lives at risk. Last edition we were chasing one word — abandoned — through a story about the unit built to investigate threats against election workers, dismantled October 1st, its leftover mail somehow still finding Republican offices. This edition the word is likely, and it is doing even more work.

Start October 14th. The Justice Department sent California's secretary of state and the Los Angeles county registrar a letter: a list of "likely noncitizens" who had received mail ballots, with instructions to review it. The Washington Examiner, NBC and Fox all described the identical demand, which made it, for about forty-eight hours, the only uncontested fact in the story.

Then October 16th. The department didn't wait on the review. The same day, the Post ran a separate item on mail ballots reported stolen elsewhere in the state, number not yet determined, which is a sentence that will reappear.

I went to the post office to mail the renewal for my car registration — the form with the box that wants a return address — and I didn't have a label, so I stood at the counter trying to remember my own zip code like a man accused of something. I got the stamp. On the way out, the rack by the door had this morning's paper folded open to a page that had nothing to do with my car.

One More Question

I called the Department of Motor Vehicles this morning because the sticker on my plate expired, and forty minutes later I still didn't have one, I had two disconnected numbers and a very patient woman named Carol who informed me I'd reached Records three times running when what I wanted was Permits. I wrote her name down. Force of habit. I write names down even when nobody's going to ask me for them later.

And while I was on hold waiting for Carol to transfer me a fourth time, something else came back to me that I'd been meaning to ask somebody about all week, and since I've got you now, I'll ask you instead of her.

On the 12th, CBS reported that federal agents had searched Representative Omar's home here in Washington, and that what they were looking for traced back to immigration paperwork — filled out by her father, when she was a child. I wrote the date down. A childhood form. That's the bottom of the file, as I understand it.

Two days later, on the 14th, the Guardian reported her phone had been seized and more than a dozen grand jury subpoenas had gone out, some of

Today we are making a sanctions waiver, which is not a dish you can get over here, so I shall go slowly. You will need a law Congress already passed, a signature already on it, and a second signature, later, taking the first one back.

CLIVE Two signatures. I am drafting a reply myself, one line that promises and the next that quietly withdraws it. I think we know who does that best at this table.

The law is the Lindsey O. Graham Sanctioning Russia and Iran Act, signed the nineteenth of September, named for the South Carolina senator who died in July, the New York Times notes. It authorised sanctions on Russia's energy sector and tariffs up to 100 percent on its buyers, the Washington Examiner says.

Housing nonprofit backed by LA mayoral candidate can't account for $87 million in housing money

By RUTH
THE MONEY DESK

“LA’s $87M taxpayer money mystery deepens as nonprofit backed by mayoral hopeful Nithya Raman faces spending scrutiny”, 16 October 2026
(PHOTO VIA NEW YORK POST — THE ORIGINAL REPORT)

■ THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. Los Angeles's city attorney demanded an audit of a housing nonprofit backed by mayoral candidate Nithya Raman.

WHO GETS PAID. The nonprofit, backed by Raman's campaign, keeps the mansion-tax money with no public accounting produced yet of where it went.

WHAT SLIPS. Voters who approved the mansion tax for housing cannot yet see how up to $87 million of it was spent.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the audit goes forward, expect the verified total to land far below any headline figure; that is what Washington got after 26 February 2025, when a $65 billion savings claim turned out to have only $9.6 billion itemized.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Eighty-seven million dollars is the size of the gap Los Angeles City Attorney Hydee Feldstein Soto wants closed. The gap sits inside a nonprofit called LAFLA, a group backed by mayoral candidate Nithya Raman. The money came from the city's "Mansion Tax" and was meant to build housing. The audit demand, reported October 16, does not say where the money went. It says the city does not know.

Start with the number itself. That qualifier is the first entry in the ledger: the city is not disputing a specific sum, it is disputing a ceiling. Eighty-seven million is the most the gap could be, which means the actual figure, whatever it turns out to be, has not been produced by anyone yet. An audit exists to find that number. As of this filing, no audit has finished....

...(cont) Second entry: who asked. The request came from the city attorney's office, dated October 16 and 17. Nothing in that request makes Feldstein Soto a candidate for mayor, and nothing here calls her one. What the request does establish is narrower and harder to argue with: in a mayoral race where Raman's campaign has built part of its case on housing policy, the only math anyone has put on paper about this particular $87 million came from outside the campaign, from an office whose job is demanding paper.

Compare the proof required elsewhere. On September 28, lawmakers from both parties criticized a taxpayer-funded television commercial for the president titled "Love Me." The commercial needed no audit to be established as a fact. It was airing. People with televisions saw it, and lawmakers objected in the same news cycle. The nonprofit's $87 million needed three weeks and a formal audit demand before anyone could even state the size of the gap, because unlike a commercial, the money does not run on a schedule anyone outside City Hall can watch.

That is the reconciliation, hon. One column shows a nonprofit Raman backs, a tax built for housing, and a figure that tops out at $87 million unaccounted. The other column shows an audit demand with two dates on it and no total yet. Until those columns match, the only number in this race anyone has actually filed is the city attorney's, and it is a ceiling, not an answer.

“Eighty-seven million dollars of mansion-tax money went into a nonprofit for housing, and the only person asking where it went works in the city attorney's office, not the campaign. That's the trick with these housing nonprofits — the tax passes, the press conference happens, and the paperwork gets quieter every year after. You can smell rent going up around here; you can't smell where this money went, and neither can the city, apparently.”

— Sal

“Look, an audit request isn't an accusation, it's a routine good-government step, that's — that's literally what audits are for, nothing to see here. And "up to $87 million" could mean the real number is way smaller, could be practically nothing, we don't know, which is exactly my point, so why is everyone treating a ceiling like a total? Did I just defend not knowing the number as the defense? That doesn't sound like me.”

The chief walks into the shop with a count, not a feeling: one company throttled a war zone's internet, and its sister company answered the resulting uproar with a flying car.

On Thursday, in Texas, Elon Musk's Tesla rolled the Roadster onto a runway, strapped it with the same high-pressure air thrusters SpaceX puts on its rockets, and had it flip and hover for a cheering crowd. CBS News filmed the acrobatics and then asked the follow-up the stage left out: who regulates this thing, on the road or off it? CBS put the question to the Department of Transportation that same afternoon. The outlet could only publish the question itself — no fuller answer has turned up since....

...(cont) The day before, in Washington, a harder question was already sitting unanswered. Ukraine's access to Starshield, the military-grade branch of SpaceX's Starlink network, had been throttled, and President Zelenskyy said the slowdown disrupted drone operations and put lives at risk. The Hill reported that same day that a bipartisan group of senators — four Republicans standing with their Democratic colleagues — had written the Pentagon demanding to know which official gave the order. By Thursday, ABC News was reporting the same bipartisan demand, unanswered still. Two days earlier, Common Dreams had already named the deeper problem: a government that leans this hard on one man's satellites has no strong position left when his satellites misbehave.

The planner points out that the government is not actually out of position — it has simply not used the position it holds. The administration can summon Musk for an honor one week and claim it cannot summon an answer from him the next; the Pentagon is Starshield's buyer, and a buyer's unused leverage is still leverage.

The tinkerer's assembly needs no new statute. Part one: the Department of Transportation puts its jurisdiction, or the lack of it, on the record before the next thruster-car livestream, not after. Part two: the Pentagon spends the leverage it already owns as the customer and gets a written answer from its own satellite contractor about who ordered the throttling. Both parts were sitting in the shop before Thursday's unveiling. The muscle just has to swing the tool already on the bench, and the pilot flies the answer back to the senators still waiting for one.

"Here's the con: one Musk company decides how fast Ukrainian soldiers get their drone feed, and when the Senate asks who made that call, his other company answers by flipping a car through the air on live television. The Pentagon pays this guy's invoices every month and still can't get him on the phone, and the Department of Transportation finds out about the new vehicle the same way the rest of us do — from a livestream. Somebody's holding the leverage here; they just keep choosing not to use it."
— Sal

"Look, the Pentagon has processes, it has channels, and when those channels produce an answer the senators will have it — that's not a cover-up, that's a bureaucracy functioning exactly as slowly as it's supposed to. And the flying car? That's innovation outpacing regulation, which is what innovation does, that's the whole point of innovation — wait, did I just defend an unregulated flying thing because it was exciting? That tracks, actually. Never mind."

INVESTIGATIONS

"Trump administration threatens to prosecute local California election workers", 17 October 2026 (PHOTO VIA ABC NEWS – THE ORIGINAL REPORT)

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Last edition we were chasing one word — abandoned — through a story about the unit built to investigate threats against election workers, dismantled October 1st, its letterhead mail somehow still finding Republican offices. This edition the word is likely, and it is doing even more work.

Start October 14th. The Justice Department sent California's secretary of state and the Los Angeles County registrar a letter: a list of "likely noncitizens" who had received mail ballots, with instructions to review it. The Washington Examiner, NBC and Fox all described the identical demand, which made it, for about forty-eight hours, the only uncontested fact in the story....

...(cont) Then October 16th. The department didn't wait on the review. The same day, the Post ran a separate item on mail ballots reported stolen elsewhere in the state, number not yet determined, which is a sentence that will reappear.

October 17th is the long beat. The letter that made every paper — ABC, the Guardian, the Post, the Examiner — went to the same local officials, about the same ballots, with the same warning: knowingly tabulate a noncitizen's ballot, face prosecution. The president posted that the sentences would be long. All together now — the list underneath the letter. The same day, California's own officials told the Times what was actually on it: thousands of names "lacking key identifying information," and, separately, names paired with addresses that sat in jurisdictions the receiving official had no authority over.

That is the document the prosecution threat rests on. In September, the governor had already signed new felony penalties for law enforcement seizing ballots or election records near polling places — written for a different threat than a list with its fields half filled in, and now sitting one courtroom away from the clerks reading this one.

Georgia's own election board, meanwhile, asked this same Justice Department to come inspect its own voting machines. That request came with no letter about jail.

✦ FROM THE CORNER ✦
DUTCH

THE FEDERAL LIST NAMING CALIFORNIA'S "LIKELY NONCITIZENS" ARRIVED WITH NAMES tagged to addresses in counties that have no power to check them, and the state's own officials said so in writing the same day the prosecution letter landed. That isn't a voter-fraud dragnet, it's a jurisdiction trap built so the only move for a county clerk is to stop certifying ballots altogether. A clerk who can't verify the list stalls the count, a stalled count means fewer ballots get certified on time, and the ballot that doesn't get certified on time is the one with your name on the envelope, sitting in a drawer past the deadline because the county official holding it was told the address on the federal sheet wasn't even his to check.

"They sent a list with half the fields blank and told the clerk reading it he could go to prison for guessing wrong — that's not law enforcement, that's a loaded gun with the safety mislabeled. Notice who gets the felony charge and who gets the apology later when the jurisdiction turns out to be the wrong county: never the guy who made the spreadsheet. This is how you turn an election into a hostage situation and call the ransom note an audit."
— Sal

"Look, a list is a list, the state had the letter, they had the names, what more do people want — did I say 'what more do people want,' that's — the addresses are wrong, okay, I heard that part too. But the point is noncitizens voting is the actual crisis here, the clerical stuff is a distraction the state's own lawyers are leaning on. I'm not saying don't fix the addresses. I'm saying fix them fast and also go to jail if you don't."
— Chip

"GOP Sens. Ted Cruz, Susan Collins join growing list of targets of suspicious 'white powder' mailings", 17 October 2026 (PHOTO VIA NEW YORK POST — THE ORIGINAL REPORT)

■ THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. The federal unit built to investigate election-threat mailings was dismantled; the mailings have since reached senators of both parties.

WHO GETS PAID. The receipts name no buyer yet.

WHAT SLIPS. Oversight of threats against election offices and lawmakers now sits with three agencies and no lead, after the dedicated unit was shut down.

WHAT'S NEXT. The FBI, the Postal Inspection Service and Capitol Police are still investigating the letters, with no lead agency named in the reporting so far.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

I went to the post office to mail the renewal for my car registration — the form with the box that wants a return address — and I didn't have a label, so I stood at the counter trying to remember my own zip code like a man accused of something. I got the stamp. On the way out, the rack by the door had this morning's paper folded open to a page that had nothing to do with my car.

That page, from the New York Post, today, said a congressman from California got an envelope mailed from New York with a return address linked to something called the DSA, and powder inside, the kind the FBI is now checking alongside the Postal Inspection Service and Capitol Police. A return address linked to a group isn't the same as one belonging to it. The paper didn't say the group sent it. It said the address was linked, and I'd rather leave that word where the paper left it....

...(cont) I have to go back a little for the order. On October 1st, the Guardian reported the administration had let go of the bodies built to look into direct threats to U.S. elections from foreign actors and from people already here — the paper's language, not mine. That's on the record; I won't retype it.

Today the list runs longer. The Post has Senator Cruz and Senator Collins both getting the powder — joining a growing list, their phrase, not CBS's; CBS, the same day, said only that federal investigators are looking into letters with unknown substances sent to state election officials and to congressional offices, no adjective on the word investigation at all. The Hill's fuller count: Senator Klobuchar, Senator Rounds, Senator Ricketts, Senator Smith, Senator Cruz, and more than fifteen House members, offices hit Friday. The Collins letter carries no day in the paper that has it. I'm not saying it wasn't Friday. I'm saying the sheet in my hand doesn't tell me that.

On the way home I sat through the toll plaza that lost its cash lane two summers back. Six lanes narrow to two ramps now, electronic, and the light changes on its own clock whether or not the car ahead has a transponder. Nobody's posted at that gate. The gate goes up anyway. I came home and read a wire story with three agency names in the same sentence — FBI, Postal Inspection Service, Capitol Police — and not one of them listed ahead of the others.

This shape isn't new. In October 2018, the Secret Service caught two packages addressed to a former president and a former secretary of state before they went anywhere; a third turned up at a cable news building and cleared the floor; a fourth carried a sitting congresswoman's name on the return label of a package meant for someone else, wrong address and all. A directory did the whole job then.

So was the office let go on October 1st built for this shape of letter, or a different threat with a different shape — foreign, the paper said, and domestic terrorism — with nothing in what I read naming a county clerk's office or a senator's desk? I don't have that answer.

I was almost out the post office door a second time today — stamps, this trip — when the clerk called after me. Excuse me, she said, you'll want your receipt. I said I meant to ask something first: the letters on the news — who's running that, the FBI, the Post Office, or the Capitol Police? She said she just works the counter. I told her so does everybody else in this story, far as I can tell.

"They tore down the shop built to watch election mail for threats and called it savings, and the savings landed on their own senators' desks — Ted Cruz and Susan Collins opening envelopes same as any county clerk would. Three agencies get named in this case and not one of them is listed in charge, and that's what it looks like when the watching stops and doesn't get put back on its own."

— Sal

"Three agencies on this — the FBI, the Postal Inspection Service, Capitol Police — that's not neglect, that's coverage, more than one specialized office ever had. Did we deprioritize the election-threat unit? We reallocated toward the fraud concerns people actually raised. The fact that a Republican senator's now opening mail with a letter opener and a prayer — that's, well, that part doesn't sound like the win I was describing, does it, no, never mind, the system's working, basically."

DHS calls case against Omar 'strong': a childhood form, a sister's phone, trash pulled here and there.

By LOU
ONE MORE QUESTION

"Ilhan Omar's phone seized and relatives subpoenaed in criminal inquiry, source says", 14 October 2026 (PHOTO VIA THE GUARDIAN — THE ORIGINAL REPORT)

★ THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. Federal agents searched Omar's trash and seized her sister's phone before any warrant existed.

WHO GETS PAID. DHS gains a marquee case against a sitting opposition lawmaker ahead of her election.

WHAT SLIPS. The warrant check that should come before a search slips: her trash and sister's phone were taken first.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the predicate holds, that is what Castle Hills, Texas got after a 2019 arrest over a council petition: the charge dropped, a Supreme Court win, and a $500,000 settlement by 15 October 2025.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

I called the Department of Motor Vehicles this morning because the sticker on my plate expired, and forty minutes later I still didn't have one, I had two disconnected numbers and a very tired man named Carol who informed me I'd reached Records three times running when what I wanted was Permits. I wrote her name down. Force of habit. I write names down even when nobody's going to ask me for them later.

And while I was on hold waiting for Carol to transfer me a fourth time, something else came back to me that I'd been meaning to ask somebody about all week, and since I've got you now, I'll ask you instead of her...

...(cont) On the 12th, CBS reported that federal agents had searched Representative Ilhan Omar's home here in Minneapolis, and that what they were looking for traced back to immigration paperwork — filled out by her father, when she was a child. I wrote the date down. A childhood form. That's the bottom of the file, as I understand it.

Two days later, on the 14th, the Guardian reported her phone had been seized and more than a dozen grand jury subpoenas had gone out, some of them to relatives. How many of that dozen went to relatives, I couldn't tell you from here. I'm asking, and guessing.

On the 16th, Secretary Mullin called the whole thing a "strong case" — strong enough, he said, to take to a grand jury. I wrote that word down too. Strong. Right under the date.

Then the next morning — today, the same morning as my sticker, as it happens — two more things landed. The Times reported that a phone belonging to Omar's sister had already been gone through, text messages and all, before agents ever searched the house. And the Hill reported that agents had been through her trash looking for DNA — "dumpster diving," they called it, which I guess really is the term, because I checked — before any search warrant existed to search anything.

Here's where I get stuck, and maybe you can set me straight, because I don't do this for a living. At the toll plaza by my house, the gate doesn't lift until the scanner reads the transponder — change first, then the arm goes up, in that order, because that's how the machine's built. The registration sticker I was chasing this morning goes in the glovebox after the car passes inspection, not before, because the sticker is supposed to mean something already happened. I don't design these systems. I just drive the car, which needs a new fan belt, which is a separate phone call I still haven't made.

So when somebody's trash gets gone through before the warrant that's supposed to authorize going through it, what drawer does that belong in. I don't have an answer. I'm asking the way I'd ask Carol.

Speaking of — she's finally got me transferred to the right office, and before the new person can even say hello, I hear myself ask her something I hadn't planned to ask: out where she works, does the form that lets you search a thing exist before the search, or does it come after? She says before. Obviously before, she says. That one's not hard for her.

It's not hard for me either. I just want to know which came first — the Secretary calling it strong, or the trash that got searched before anybody had the paper saying they could.

★ FROM THE CORNER ★
Dr.Cox

DHS AGENTS WENT THROUGH Ilhan Omar's trash for DNA and had already pulled her sister's phone before any warrant existed for either, and the Homeland Security Secretary is now calling the file that resulted a "strong case" headed to a grand jury. That isn't a warrant justifying a search, that's a search writing its own warrant after the fact, with DHS holding the pen. Because that would be a sitting member of Congress with a staff and a press office, it moves faster on a house with neither, so the next time you roll your bin to the curb on collection day, understand DHS does not need your permission to go through what's inside it, only your trash day.

"They went through her trash for DNA and grabbed her sister's phone before anybody signed a warrant, and then the Secretary gets on camera and calls that a "strong case," like he's bragging about the recipe instead of admitting there wasn't one yet. This isn't building a case, it's building a jacket, and they built it on a woman whose father filled out a form when she was a kid, using her own family to do it. If DHS can turn somebody's trash into a federal case before a judge signs anything, the next "strong case" doesn't need a warrant either, it just needs somebody nobody important enough to notice."
— Sal

"Look, if the Secretary says it's a strong case headed to a grand jury, that's just the process working exactly the way it's designed to — agents doing their homework before they bring charges, nothing unusual there. Okay, technically some of that homework happened before the warrant existed, which, fine, is not the optics you'd pick if you were picking optics, but the trash thing is a well-established investigative technique, it's not like — did I just defend someone's garbage as a legal strategy? That's not where I meant to end up."

THE WAIVER

Trump signs Russia sanctions law named for Lindsey Graham, then waives it the day before it takes effect.

THE EURO DESK

"Tillis: Trump's Russia deal 'is tarnishing Lindsey Graham's efforts' at sanctions", 11 October 2026 (PHOTO VIA THE HILL — THE ORIGINAL REPORT)

■ THE SHORT VERSION

typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. President Trump signed an executive order waiving the Russia sanctions law he had just signed.

WHO GETS PAID. Russia's energy sector and its largest oil buyers get the sanctions and tariffs lifted before they ever take effect.

WHAT SLIPS. Congress's sanctions vote, passed by both chambers and signed into law, loses its force before it ever bites.

WHAT'S NEXT. If Congress does not force a vote to override the waiver, the sanctions stay suspended indefinitely; that is what happened after the Senate's 2019 Yemen war-powers resolution: the president vetoed it on April 16, the override failed 53 to 45, and the policy it targeted continued 21 more months.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Today we are making a sanctions waiver, which is not a dish you can get over here, so I shall go slowly. You will need a law Congress already passed, a signature already on it, and a second signature, later, taking the first one back.

Clive Two signatures. I am drafting a reply myself, one line that promises and the next that quietly withdraws it. I think we know who does that best at this table.

...(cont) The law is the Lindsey O. Graham Sanctioning Russia and Iran Act, signed the nineteenth of September, named for the South Carolina senator who died in July, the New York Times notes. It authorised sanctions on Russia's energy sector and tariffs up to 100 percent on its buyers, the Washington Examiner says.

Gary Authorised. We authorised Keith to fix the boiler in March. He has since authorised himself a jumper, and the boiler is still cold.

The law was already bending before Friday. On the ninth of October the President lifted sanctions tied to Russian diesel exports, then two days later announced an energy ceasefire with Russia. That Sunday Senator Thom Tillis said chasing Russian oil was "tarnishing Lindsey Graham's efforts" to get the sanctions enforced.

Rob Tarnishing. Heavy word. I said this house would tarnish the minute the meter went in March, and nobody thanked me for the lentils that got us through it.

By Thursday the sixteenth, before Friday existed, Le Monde had Zelensky at the Brussels summit asking the allies for seventy billion more euros for 2027, weakened, in his own word, by what he called Donald Trump's "betrayal." The ask was filed before the order it is now meant to answer.

Clive Nobody thanks me either. Mine has been unfinished three weeks, which outlasts any lentil in this house.

Then Friday, the seventeenth. The BBC, which is what they have here, calls it waiving "many restrictions on Moscow" over "national security" concerns. NBC has the President's own phrase: the pause is "in the national interests of the United States." CBS has the waiver reaching tariffs on the largest buyers of Russian oil, timed to ease prices by tapping Russian energy; RTÉ confirms it targets Russia's energy revenues. The Examiner calls the hold indefinite; the Guardian calls it a pause.

You will be looking for the vote that undoes this. There is none; Congress passed the law in both chambers, and now watches the waiver stand.

A pause sitting next to the word indefinite does not resolve itself by Monday.

Russia's oil buyers keep the exemption Friday gave them. Brussels was already a day short of its seventy billion euros before the order existed, and is shorter now.

Keith Short. I can move short. I know a man who will take the whole law off your hands, nameplate included, and never ask whose name was on it.

❦ FROM THE CORNER ❦

Dutch

Congress passed the Russia sanctions law, the President signed it last month, and he hung Lindsey Graham's name on it, the senator who died writing it in July. That is not a sanctions law, it is a nameplate rented out until the day Moscow's oil needed the room. Because the waiver signed Friday lifts the tariffs on the largest buyers of Russian oil, Moscow's revenue keeps moving, and because sanctions were the lever Brussels was counting on to shrink the gap, the seventy billion euros Zelensky asked the summit for a day earlier now carries no American half, landing on the next foreign-aid line with the reader's own name typed on the tax return that funds it.

"They slap a dead senator's name on the sanctions bill for the cameras, then the president waives the whole thing the day before it bites, and the tab for Ukraine gets handed to Brussels instead. That's not national security, that's a shell game with a flag pin on it. Seventy billion euros doesn't fall out of the sky — somebody's paying it, and it sure isn't the guy who signed both pieces of paper."

— Sal

"Look, it's a national-security waiver, full stop, the order says so right there — did I say "full stop"? I mean, the administration's been clear this is about easing energy prices for families, that's — okay, "tarnishing Lindsey Graham's efforts," that's not my line, a sitting senator from his own party said that, so maybe don't look at me."

— Chip

Press secretary fired after five days, replacing the Scaramucci as American politics' base unit of time

■ THE SHORT VERSION

WHAT HAPPENED. Trump fired his new White House press secretary, Katie Zacharia, days after he picked her for the job.

WHO GETS PAID. The president gains: he alone picks and removes the person who answers reporters, and no one else votes on it.

WHAT SLIPS. The on-the-record briefing thins out, and the new spokesperson's main answers came in a friendly Fox News interview instead.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the podium stays thin through the election, the briefing becomes optional; Washington saw that after 18 September 2026, when the White House banned CNN, MS NOW and Politico and their reporters' passes were disabled at the gate the next day.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Today we are making a press secretary, which does not keep. You will need five days: Katie Zacharia was picked on the ninth of October and fired on Friday, five days after she took the job, which a White House official told the Guardian before anyone had announced it formally.

For the rest you will need a conservative commentator who had been a communications adviser at Trump Media and Technology Group; the vacancy left by Karoline Leavitt, who went in August; a law degree from Pepperdine, 2011, which the university confirms; and the midterm elections, less than a month off. No, you cannot substitute....

Clive Does not keep. Nothing I write keeps either, not in this house, and I am the only one at this table producing anything at all.

Gary You are producing a smell of toast and a locked door. I could have that door off in an afternoon and the house would thank me for the light.

Begin on Tuesday, with the first briefing: fourteen minutes of it, and widely panned. That one went on the floor in front of the whole room. Anthony Scaramucci, whom the president made communications director in July 2017 — Sean Spicer announced he would resign over the appointment — posted that afternoon, "The clock is running," and then, "Thus far 1/11th of a Scaramucci."

Rob You took the shed door off in the spring and it is still leaning on the boiler. It was always going to end like this.

Keith There is an angle in it. Tenure sold by the unit, American, stamped on a mug — moving by Thursday, and the kitty takes its cut.

Thursday she sat with Sean Hannity on Fox News and said she had not passed the bar exam, which is the examination that decides whether a person with a law degree may practise law at all; a graduate who has not passed it cannot. She had said before that she practised law, and the president had described her as an attorney. You will be looking for the hearing. There is none: the job is handed over by one man and taken back by the same one, and on Friday a press official said she had been "let go."

RTÉ, the Irish broadcaster, printed it as arithmetic — "Scaramucci replaced by shorter unit of time - a Zacharia." Le Monde called the stint gaffe-filled. At home the word was "let go."

Clive A mug. I offer this house a verse and it wants crockery; I shall read it anyway, and the meter can listen.

Serves the president, who is flying round the country boosting Republican candidates with the elections less than a month away. The briefing room pays: five days of press secretary, fourteen minutes of it at the podium.

Rob Read it to the meter, it is the only thing here still on. They have got through theirs already, and we have not had a rota since the clocks went back.

❦ FROM THE CORNER ❦

Katie Zacharia was picked on the ninth of October, gave a fourteen-minute first briefing on Tuesday, told Fox News on Thursday she had not passed the bar exam, and was let go on Friday, five days in. That is not a job with a spokesman in it; it is a podium the president lends out by the day and takes back before the announcement is even written. So the answering moves to Fox News because the briefing room has nobody standing in it, and the president flies round the country boosting candidates because the questions have nowhere left to land, and the only place left for yours is the television in your own front room, where you say it out loud on a Thursday night to nobody.

"They told us she was an attorney, she told Hannity she never passed the bar, and five days later she's gone — the job of standing up and answering for this government got filled like a shift nobody wanted. That podium is the one place a reporter gets to ask the White House something in public and get it on the record. A month out from the elections, the president's out flying round for candidates and the answering happens on Fox."

— Sal

"Look, she was let go — let go, that's not fired, there's a difference, and if you can't hear the difference that's — did I say that? That doesn't sound like me. The president acted inside a week, which is accountability, which is the thing you people say you want; and Pepperdine handed out the degree, so take the credentials question up with Pepperdine."

On the worst of the worst

70.6 PERCENT

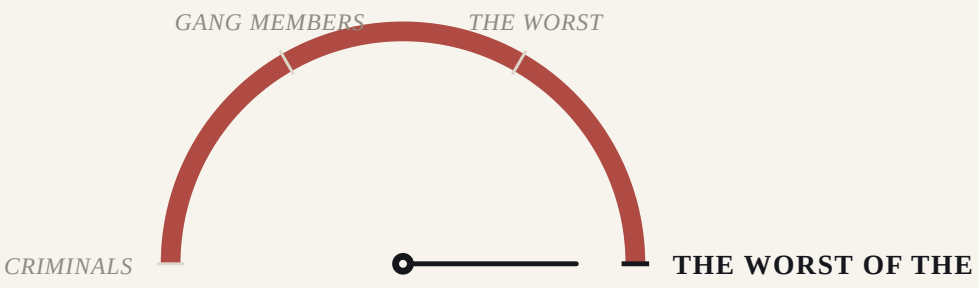

The beds. In July, TRAC counted 65,765 people in ICE detention; 46,436 of them, 70.6 percent, had no criminal conviction [1]. A year earlier the AP's count was 71.7 percent [2]. The population peaked at 68,289 in early February [3].

The people in them. NPR reported in April that 29 people had died in ICE custody since October, surpassing the previous record of 28, set in 2004 [4]; Human Rights Watch counted 52 deaths from January 20, 2025 through June 4, 2026 [5]. ProPublica documented more than 170 U.S. citizens held by immigration agents, nearly 20 of them children [6]. The phrase is the worst of the worst. The count is seven in ten with no conviction at all.

THE WORST OF THE WORST

The phrase is the administration's own, and it is repeated on purpose. The Associated Press reported the president's pledge to deport "the worst of the worst" [1]. His press secretary, in February: "The Trump administration will continue our focus on deporting all illegal aliens present in our country, with a focus on the worst of the worst criminals" [2]. The Homeland Security Department, on the anniversary of the inauguration: ICE was "unleashed" to "target the worst of the worst criminal illegal aliens" [3].

And there are real people behind the phrase. The same detention data that measures the whole population also counts about 19,000 people held in July who do have criminal convictions [4]. Removing people convicted of crimes is a job every administration claims, and this one names it first. How much of the detention system that job fills is on the other side.

3. "He unleashed ICE to target the worst of the worst criminal illegal aliens" — Department of Homeland Security, 20 January 2026 ↑
4. 65,765 people in ICE detention, of whom 46,436 had no criminal conviction — TRAC Immigration, quick facts, 11 July 2026 ↑

“I read the phrase in three places. The press secretary: "a focus on the worst of the worst criminals." The department, on the anniversary: ICE "unleashed" on "the worst of the worst." Then I went to the clearinghouse that counts the detention population, just to meet a few of them. July: sixty-five thousand seven hundred sixty-five people in detention. Forty-six thousand four hundred thirty-six with no criminal conviction. Seventy point six percent. Excuse me — I'm going — one question. If the worst of the worst are thirty percent of the beds, who's in the other seventy?” — Lou

“"The worst of the worst." Beautiful phrase. It's on the podium, it's in the press releases, it's the first thing out of the briefing room. Then the research clearinghouse that counts detention looks at who's actually in the beds: seventy point six percent with no criminal conviction. That's not the worst of the worst. That's the most of the most. And more than a hundred seventy of the people they've held were American citizens.”

“A person without a conviction is simply a person who hasn't been convicted yet, and the administration is being proactive, which is the worst of the worst thing you can say about an administration that is doing its job.”
