Today we are making a non-concession, which is not a dish you can get over here, so I will go slowly. You will need a presidential runoff held on a Sunday, a candidate who refuses to accept he lost it, a flight to Miami, and a president in Washington who has not yet said who won; there is no quick substitute for an actual concession.

October 29th: "This is an invasion of our Country and our Military is waiting for you!" Fifty-two hundred troops sent the same day. Then I found a count of how often one network said the word: twelve hundred two times the week before the election. Two hundred three the week after. And the people in it were at the border in Tijuana, about a hundred asylum claims a day, three thousand names on a list. Sorry, the kids are at the door. It was born in September at a single school in the economically deprived suburbs of Paris: teacher shortages, overcrowded classrooms, dilapidated buildings beset by rats and falling debris. Democracy Now! reported on 6 October that nearly 2,000 high schools had been blockaded or closed.

That isn't a candidate in exile, it is a second government on standby, waiting for Washington to pick it over the one Brazilians actually elected. WHAT HAPPENED. The Washington Examiner published the same $994 Social Security payment amount five times this month, each time citing a different number of days until it arrives.

WHO GETS PAID. The receipts name no buyer yet.

WHAT SLIPS. The press's own job here — telling readers something new — slips into recycling one fixed number as if each countdown were news.

WHAT'S NEXT. The December $994 payment is due around December 1, and the retirement payment capped at $5,181 is due around November 10; both are already on the calendar.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

On October 7th the Washington Examiner reported that a Social Security payment worth $994 would arrive in 23 days. On October 10th, the same payment, the same $994, was reported arriving in 20 days. On October 11th it was 19 days. On October 28th, the same $994, now two days out. Four headlines, four editions, one number: $994. The only figure that moved, each time, was the one anybody holding a calendar could have supplied without a byline.

That payment went out. On October 31st the Examiner opened a new clock: a December payment, worth $994, arriving in 31 days. The number that had just finished counting down to zero started over at the top, unchanged. Five headlines this month, one amount, carried from November into December without so much as a comma's difference....

...(cont) The October 31st edition also carried a second countdown, running on its own clock: a Social Security retirement payment, capped at $5,181, arriving in 10 days. Two countdowns, two numbers, one masthead, neither requiring a reporter so much as a calendar and the payment schedule the Social Security Administration already publishes.

A reconciliation, then, hon. The December headline calls the payment "Social Security." The body copy, in its first sentence, names it correctly: Supplemental Security Income.

None of the five articles changes the $994. None changes the rule that produces it — the first of the month, pushed to the last business day of the one before when the first falls on a weekend. What changes, edition to edition, is the number of days between the reader and a figure that was never in motion. That is not five stories. That is one fact, filed five times, with the countdown doing the work a single sentence could do: the payment is $994, it arrives on the first of the month, next.

The retirement payment capped at $5,181 will presumably get its own run of editions before it arrives, each one subtracting a day. The arithmetic is not the news. The number of times the arithmetic gets billed as news is.

❦ FROM THE CORNER ❦

DUTCH

The Washington Examiner ran the same $994 figure in five headlines this month, each one naming a different number of days until it arrives. That is not reporting, that is a countdown clock wearing a byline, selling the reader the same fact back one subtraction at a time. Because the number never moves, the only thing the reader needed was the calendar nailed to the kitchen wall, where the first of the month was already circled before the paper ever ran it.

"They don't call it a rerun, they call it an update. Same $994, five headlines, each one just subtracting a day off a number the reader could get from a calendar nailed to the wall. That's a countdown clock wearing a press badge, counting down to a check that doesn't move while they count."
— Sal

"This is basic constituent service — people need to know when their check arrives, and Social Security already publishes the payment calendar, so we're just reporting it. Five times. For the same payment. That does sound like a lot of times to report a date that's printed on a government website. Did I say that? That doesn't sound like me."

Trump mourns carriage industry's death, blaming "one tragic accident" after decades of public debate.

By MORT
THE RECORDS BUREAU

“Mamdani is ... right? It's time to retire New York's horse-drawn carriage tradition”, 31 October 2026 (PHOTO VIA WASHINGTON EXAMINER — THE ORIGINAL REPORT)

■ THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. New York City's Council voted to end horse-drawn carriages after decades of debate.

WHO GETS PAID. The receipts name no buyer yet.

WHAT SLIPS. Nothing slips here yet.

WHAT'S NEXT. The ban does not take effect until June 2028, so the industry keeps operating under today's rules until then.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

New York City's horse-drawn carriage industry died Oct. 22, when the City Council voted 40 to 7 to end it.

It did not go quietly, and it did not go fast. Mayor Zohran Mamdani and Council Speaker Julie Menin struck the deal to end it on Oct. 14; the formal vote came eight days later, Thursday afternoon, closing out decades of public debate in a single sitting. The ban itself does not take effect until June 2028, so the carriages have nineteen months of this city left in them before the law finishes the job the vote started. That is not an execution. That is a long goodbye, dressed up as a verdict....

...(cont) The margin says something the date alone would not. Forty to seven is not a fight; it is a formality that took decades to become one. Whatever case the carriage trade had made across those years of controversy, it did not survive contact with a council that had already counted its votes before the mayor ever signed on.

President Trump marked the death the same day, calling it "so sad" and attributing it "largely" to "one tragic accident" — his phrase for whatever incident the Council had spent years citing as cause. A president does not usually eulogize a municipal licensing fight. That he did here says less about the carriages than about who gets mourned in this country, and who decides.

The stranger survivor arrived nine days later. The Washington Examiner, no ally of the mayor on any other subject, ran a column headlined "Mamdani is ... right?" and meant it. Decades of debate had produced plenty of malarkey from every direction, and the Examiner's own writer waited until the vote was finished before conceding the socialist mayor's side of it. That is not an endorsement. It is a eulogy, filed by the one mourner nobody expected to show, arriving later than the president's and emptier of nostalgia.

What dies here is not the horse or the park, and certainly not the clip-clop Trump mourned. It is a business model that depended on nobody counting too closely — not the hours, not the pavement, not the accidents. In lieu of flowers, the city might spend the nineteen months before June 2028 deciding what else in New York has lasted this long only because nobody ever put it to a vote.

“Decades of complaints, a 40 to 7 vote, and the president boils the whole record down to one accident he never even names. That is not grief, that is erasing the paper trail. Next time somebody tells you a program failed because of one bad apple, ask how many decades of bad apples it took to get a vote that lopsided.”
— Sal

“This is heritage, this is tourism, this is a hundred and sixty years of New York character the Council torched over one tragic accident — did I say one? There might've been others the Council kept citing for years, but one is the number that fits on a sign, and nostalgia polls better than a safety record anyway.”
— Chip

Washington Examiner RIGHT § 11:00 EDT

From the passenger seat, it is easy to understand the appeal. A horse-drawn carriage moving through Central Park offers a little piece of an older New York: the clip-clop of hooves, trees overhead, skyscrapers beyond them and, for a few minutes, the illusion that the city has slowed down. WHAT HAPPENED. President Trump again promised that the Iran war will end "soon," without giving any further detail.

WHO GETS PAID. The receipts name no buyer yet.

WHAT SLIPS. The public's ability to hold the administration to a fixed timetable slips, since no date or detail has been given in over a month.

WHAT'S NEXT. If Congress again declines to vote on this war, it continues unchecked; that is what Congress got after it vetoed the Yemen war resolution in 2019: support for that war continued 21 more months.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Whatever infancy it had was combative from the start: on September 1st, after American forces resumed bombing Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps targets, the president took to Truth Social to warn Iran it would be hit "at a much harder and higher level" if it retaliated. That is not a peace plan. It is a warning label.

By the end of the month the promise had competition. Axios reported that the president was willing to offer Iran sanctions relief and unfreeze its funds for a look at its nuclear program. Monday, he denied it on Truth Social, calling the story untrue and the offer, by extension, imaginary. Whatever door had opened closed again without anyone outside the family hearing it latch....

...(cont) Tuesday, in Lubbock, Texas, the promise learned a new trick. "You'll see Iran in a couple of weeks, if you don't mind," the president told a rally crowd, dating the war's resolution to a campaign schedule for a second time this autumn. A deadline that moves with the election is not a deadline. It is bunk, dressed as one.

Friday the promise met its own contradictions in public. Iran's supreme leader warned the United States and Israel against new attacks, Qatari mediators kept pushing for a deal, and the president again predicted the war would end soon, again without saying how. The same day, his administration warned Iran of "consequences," and Marco Rubio raised energy security and the Strait of Hormuz at the G20. National Review asked whether the president and Netanyahu would choose victory, insisting any resumed offensive needs a clear goal to justify it — the choosing, evidently, already made for them earlier in the week, in Lubbock.

The promise is survived by a war that has not stopped, a mediation that has not closed, and a sanctions offer the president calls fiction. It is preceded in death by every earlier version of itself — the one from September, the one from the rally, the one from this morning's wire. In lieu of flowers, ask the White House for the detail it has owed since September.

"This promise renews like a subscription nobody can cancel — it comes back every few weeks with the same line, no date attached. The Strait of Hormuz gets a warning label, Rubio gets a seat at the G20, and Congress still hasn't cast a single vote on this war. "Soon" survives because nobody who could end it has to put it on the calendar."
— Sal

"You don't hand the enemy a calendar — the "soon" moves because the situation on the ground moves, that's just good operational security. And warning Iran about "consequences" the same week you're promising peace, that's leverage, that's — wait, that's also just the same threat from September with a new date stamped on it. Did I say that? Forget I said that."

WHAT HAPPENED Homeland Security says its investigation of Representative Ilhan Omar is large and targets several people.

WHO GETS MAD The White House gains the same case is the fault for the president's push to remove her from her House seat.

WHAT ELSE The voters who elected her could lose their member by a court ruling or a House vote instead of an election.

WHAT'S NEXT The secretary says investigators expect to take the case to a grand jury, and the push to expel her is headed for the Supreme Court, where the governing case is a half-century old. The midterms are Tuesday.

ARTICLE ON THE PAGES

The paperwork is still the story, so let me walk you through it in order.

13 September: Fox News carries the border czar confirming a criminal investigation into Ilhan Omar and declining to describe it. 14 September: Omar says the Department of Homeland Security has not contacted her. 12 October: Homeland Security agents search her Minneapolis home. 13 October: she calls the search part of a playbook meant to produce a distraction ahead of the midterms.…

[cont.] Then the audiences arrive. All together now — follow the adjective. On 14 October the Homeland Security secretary told CBS News the probe was a "strong case," and that investigators expected to present it to a grand jury. On 17 October the New York Post reported that federal investigators were building a case that could lead to deporting her. On 18 October former President Barack Obama wrote that the government cannot selectively target individuals for their political views or for what they say, which is the sort of sentence that used to be a civics worksheet. On 21 October the Washington Examiner reported the case is complicated by procedural factors when the alleged offense occurred in a who filled out the forms that granted her citizenship. On 23 October a Justice Department filing referred to her by another name without explanation; the president posted about it; she replied that her name has always been Ilhan Omar.

And today, 31 October, the secretary tells the New York Post the case is a "large case," targeting multiple people, led by the Justice Department. Nineteen days after agents went through her home, the public record has advanced from strong to large. I can find no charges in it. The grand jury is still months away. Investigators expect to do.

Line two of today's wire. Fox News reports that the fight over the Omar search warrant sits with Judge James Boasberg, who also has the deportation-fights case and the California voter-rolls case, and that this raises assignment questions. Three cases about who gets removed from where, one docket, and the news is the judge.

Line three deserves a second read. The push to throw her out of House is heading toward a Supreme Court test of Powell v. McCormack, the half-century-old precedent governing whether the House can refuse a member the voters elected — and legal experts tell Fox News that the old case may actually support expelling her, a twist they call uncharted.

So the case against her as a citizen is at the adjective stage, with the grand jury pending. The case against her as a member of Congress is already drafted for the Supreme Court. Election Day is Tuesday.

> "They searched the woman's house first and they're still shopping for the noun — strong case, large case, multiple people, that's not evidence, that's a weather report. Six weeks of this and the only thing that grew is the adjectives. We'll be running three days out from an election. If a seat can be emptied by adjective, we can forget."
> — Dot

> "Nobody is targeting anybody — a judge signed that warrant, and the Justice Department does not call a case large for the fun of it. Did I say large? The secretary said large. That's scope, that's not a problem. And the only question here is how one Judge ended up with all three of these, which, no, I'm not the one raising that, Fox raised that."

Trump's 250-foot arch for snipers and drones, built for America's 250th anniversary, draws second lawsuit this month

■ THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. Washington, D.C., and Virginia sued the Interior Department and the Park Service to stop the president's triumphal arch.

WHO GETS PAID. The military got the complex it asked for, and the president got a design the historic-preservation council said it could not change.

WHAT SLIPS. Expert and public comment was cut off in September, so the only check left on a monument Congress never voted on is a judge.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the closed consultation holds, the design stands while courts take months. That is what Washington got after September 4, when Interior announced excavation even as an attorney said there was no legal authority, and the project reached a second lawsuit on October 31.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Before I ask you anything, let me just read you the list. I wrote it all down in order, it's in the raincoat here, hold on — ah. Here it is.

April: the Commission of Fine Arts approves the arch. September 4: the Interior Secretary, Doug Burgum, announces excavation will begin. September 20: the President posts that the arch will incorporate a "top grade military complex," at the request of the U.S. military, for National Security purposes. Snipers. Drones. September 28: the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation closes its consultation with the experts and the general public. October 9: Arlington County sues. October 31, yesterday: Washington, D.C., and Virginia sue the National Park Service and the Interior Department....

...(cont) That's the list. I didn't add anything to it. That's just the order it came in.

Now, the twenty-eighth. I want to go back to the twenty-eighth, and I'm sorry, because I assumed the first time that I'd copied it down backwards. The council's vice chairman, Travis Voyles, sent a letter saying the consultation was closing, and here's the reason given: addressing the experts' concerns and the general public's would require them to deviate from the president's vision for the project. A preservation group said it was gobsmacked. That's their word, not mine.

I keep coming back to it — sorry — because of the eight days. On the twentieth, the military asked for a change, and the President wrote that he had agreed to convert the arch. Eight days later the letter goes out explaining that changes can't be addressed.

And before either of those, on the fourth of September, an attorney named Nicolas Sansone said the administration had no legal authority to begin work on its monumental arch. The excavation announcement came that same Thursday anyway.

Here's what I can't get past, and it's small. My car's been going to the same garage for eleven years, fan belt, always the fan belt. Last time the kid hands me a clipboard at the counter, and the clipboard says, tell us anything else you've noticed. So I notice. I write down the shimmy at forty, I write down the wiper. He reads it, he hands the clipboard back to me, and he says he can't put those on the ticket, because the ticket's already approved and anything I noticed would change the ticket. Then he asks me to initial the bottom. I'm still paying for the clipboard, is my point. I paid a man to ask me.

I apologize, I'm on the twenty-eighth again. Somebody typed that letter. Somebody printed it, somebody signed it, somebody carried it down a hallway to go out. That's a person walking a piece of paper across a room to tell the experts that the review they were in the middle of had reached the one answer it wasn't allowed to reach.

Then October 9. Arlington County sues over a 250-foot arch, citing tourism and the safety of local residents. Two hundred fifty feet, for the 250th anniversary of the country, planted between the Lincoln Memorial and Arlington National Cemetery. The people buried there don't get a comment period either, but nobody closed theirs on a Monday.

Which brings us to yesterday. D.C. and Virginia, in federal court, against the Park Service and Interior, arguing the thing should have required congressional approval and that its height is a problem. That's the second suit this month. The consultation cost somebody nothing to shut. The lawsuits cost two states and a county their lawyers.

Excuse me — before you go, you've got your hand on the door. Just one thing. Two requests landed in September. The military's, on the twentieth, which got the arch changed. The public's, which was still open on the twenty-eighth. So which of those two turned out to be the deviation from the president's vision?

❦ FROM THE CORNER ❦

DUTCH

On September 28 the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation closed its consultation with experts and the public, because addressing their concerns would require deviating from the president's vision. Eight days before that, the President posted that the arch will carry a top grade military complex, snipers and drones, at the military's request. That is not a monument with a comment period, it is a weapons platform with the suggestion box nailed shut and a ribbon on it: the council closed the file, so the only desk left that takes an objection is a federal courtroom, which is why Virginia and the District had to put paid lawyers in front of a judge yesterday to say the same thing you already wrote by hand on the comment form that is still sitting on your desk.

"They shut the public consultation because answering the public would mean changing the drawing — that is not a review, that is a receipt for your own silence. It took Arlington County on the 9th, then D.C. and Virginia yesterday, to get a judge to look at a 250-foot arch with a military complex in it going up next to Arlington National Cemetery. They tell you there's no money and no time for your concerns; there's money, it's going into snipers and drones on a monument to a birthday."
— Sal

"The Commission of Fine Arts cleared this back in April, so the review happened, and the consultation closed because it had run its course, not because — did I say that? That doesn't sound like me. The military requested the security features themselves, for National Security purposes, and frankly two lawsuits in a month is how you can tell a project is significant."

Students marching over classroom rats enter weekend three; now showing at American rallies, three days before the vote.

● THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Bot

WHAT HAPPENED. French students entered a third weekend of protests over school funding; Trump's rallies call the protests migrant and communist unrest.

WHO GETS PAID. Republicans three days from the midterms get campaign footage out of a foreign school-funding fight.

WHAT ELSE. One outlet filed the same Saturday's arrest count at 135 and at nearly 1,000, so readers lose the plain record of what police did.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the mass arrests hold, few end in convictions; Washington charged 234 people after the January 2017 march, convicted no defendant who went to trial, and dropped the last 39 cases in July 2018.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

The accurate name for what French schoolchildren are doing died on 20 October, at a rally in Kansas, at the age of roughly seven weeks. It is survived by a third weekend of marches, by an interior minister's warning, and by an American election on Tuesday. It was preceded in death by the arrest count.

It was born in September at a single school in the economically deprived suburbs of Paris: teacher shortages, overcrowded classrooms, dilapidated buildings beset by rats and falling debris. Democracy Now! reported on 6 October that nearly 2,000 high schools had been blockaded or closed.... (cont) The renaming began the following week, and renaming is penny-ante work. On 18 October the Washington Examiner reported the president telling France to "close your borders" while police arrested 1,800. On the 20th, from a stage in Kansas, the Guardian reported him attacking "migrants and communists," turning the demonstrations into a cautionary tale for American voters while his party faced midterm losses. France 24 published a fact-check on the 21st: the immigration claims were false. Inside four days the thing had been called rioting and looting, then called somebody else's invasion, and the students got a vote on neither name.

The count went next. Fox News filed one Saturday's arrests at 135, and later in the month at nearly 1,000. The Morning Star reported on 25 October that more than half a million people marched over school funding and the soaring cost of living, that the government put the arrests near a thousand, and that tear gas and water cannon met the Paris march near its endpoint. Of the figures in circulation — 135, nearly 1,000, 1,800 — one of them is the number of people who spent that night in a cell. The footage runs the same either way.

Which brings us to tonight. The New York Post reports a third weekend beginning and Interior Minister Laurent Nuñez warning of a "very high risk" of disorder, especially after dark on Halloween. The schools are still the schools. The rats are still the rats. Three days from now Americans vote, and some of them will have seen all this on a screen behind a podium, under a caption written in Kansas.

In lieu of flowers, ask whoever shows you the footage what the marchers asked for, and check the arrest count twice before Tuesday.

> "Kids marched because there are rats in their school and the building drops pieces on them, and inside two days that became an immigration and in Kansas. Same month, the same network files one Saturday at 135 arrests and then at nearly a thousand — pick a number, because the picture plays fine with either one under it. Three days from now people vote here on a feeling they got from a crowd over there that was asking for a working classroom."
> — Sol

> "Look, the man never said the schools were fine — did I say that? That doesn't sound like me — he said close your borders, which is a separate point, and a half a million people in the street with water cannon is not exactly a bake sale. The arrest figure moved because the situation was moving; nobody's hiding anything, the second number is bigger, which if anything proves our side was being conservative. And honestly, whether it's rats or riots, the lesson for Tuesday is the same, so I don't see what we're arguing about."

Trump's $8 billion farm rescue arrives at under five times what billionaires already spent steering the election

By RUTH
THE MONEY DESK

● THE SHORT VERSION
Timed by Bot

WHAT HAPPENED. The Trump administration released an emergency farm relief fund just before Election Day, after earlier cutting the same aid.

WHO GETS PAID. The announcement bought goodwill for the party's midterm campaign in farm states, delivered at a campaign rally in Kansas.

WHAT SLIPS. No recorded congressional vote preceded the payout, so the public's check on election-season emergency spending slips to the White House's own calendar.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the pattern holds, expect another relief gesture timed to the political calendar rather than the price; that is what Washington got after 31 March 2021 a 160-million-barrel reserve release framed as relief from "Putin's Price Hike at the Pump."

AS LAID OUT IN FULL

The war in Iran turned six months old in August with no end in sight, after the administration said it would be quick. In September, a United Nations inquiry found the strikes already carried out were likely war crimes. The Congressional Budget Office filed its own number days later: nearly $40 billion spent, and conservative, its word, not an upper bound. A senator who voted to confirm the defense secretary has since called for his firing twice, and a member of his own party has filed paperwork to impeach him. The president has said publicly the war will not conclude before the election. The farmers paying the diesel prices this war helped drive up did not get a line in any of that.

Then came the fund. On October 7th, an analysis counted $1.7 billion spent by 172 billionaire families on the 2026 midterms, the most ever recorded in a midterm cycle, most of it routed through the super PACs the 2010 Citizens United decision built for exactly this purpose. Two days after that, CBS News ran a farmer's verdict on the fund in its headline: a dime to use and a dollar too short. The same story asked John Boyd Jr., who founded the National Black Farmers Association, to share his thoughts; it did not print those thoughts as the line....

[cont] Run the ledger. Eight billion divided by one point seven billion comes to about four hundred seventy percent, call it under five times over. Five times what 172 families spent to steer this election is what the fund came to for the people growing the food the same war taxed. The families' money moved first, filed and counted by October 7th. The fund moved second, after the cost of the war that drove the prices was already logged at nearly $40 billion and called conservative.

The dime-too-late farmer and the 172 billionaire families are reading the same federal budget, hon. One of them wrote it.

FROM THIS CORNER ▸ Dr.Cyn

The $1.7 billion from 172 billionaire families poured in. The $8 billion came from pulled triggers and bombed schools. They say after it, of a piece in Kansas. That isn't my lot. It's a receipt for its existence already rendered. The food cost the same long as the war that pushed diesel higher, so the diesel bill reaches your truck before the relief check does, and it's the diesel receipt sitting in your glovebox that's dated first.

"They cut the farm checks, then handed them back a slightly smaller dollars hawvier two weeks before people vote, and they're calling that generosity. The same month, 172 billionaire families had already dropped one point seven billion steering who wins this election outright. Do that math once and you see who's mother buys the vote and which one just quiets the guy who grows the food."
— Sol

"This is farmers-first governance, not an election stunt — it's pure coincidence the check cleared two weeks before people voted, farmers just happen to need help every October. And the billionaire money is private citizens exercising their rights, totally unconnected to anything the administration is doing — wait, did I just connect those? Forget I said that."
— Chip

On the caravan

The response. On October 29, 2018, the Pentagon announced 5,200 troops for the border in "Operation Faithful Patriot" [1]. Its report to Congress put the cost at $210 million: $72 million for about 5,900 active-duty troops through December 15, and $138 million for 2,100 Guard troops [2].

The attention. By Grabien's count, Fox News said "caravan" 1,202 times from October 30 to November 5, the week before the election, and 203 times from November 7 to 13, the week after — a drop of 83 percent; CNN went from 834 to 75, MSNBC from 586 to 110 [3]. The people themselves were in Tijuana by mid-November, with about 100 asylum claims processed a day and more than 3,000 names on the wait list [4]. The emergency ended on Election Day. The caravan was still there.

THE CARAVAN

The alarm, in his words. October 22, 2018: "Sadly, it looks like Mexico's Police and Military are unable to stop the Caravan heading to the Southern Border of the United States. Criminals and unknown Middle Easterners are mixed in. I have alerted Border Patrol and Military that this is a National Emergy. Must change laws!" [1]. October 29: "This is an invasion of our Country and our Military is waiting for you!" [2].

The caravan was real, and it was large. The United Nations counted about 7,200 people as of October 22; Mexico's government said about 3,630 two days later; the AP estimated 4,000 to 5,000 on October 28 [3]. Several thousand people walking north toward the border is a genuine event for the agencies that meet them, and a president who calls attention to it is describing something that existed. What happened to the attention is on the other side.

“My granddaughter asked me what the scariest costume was, and I said, well, in 2018 it was a caravan. October 22nd: "a National Emergy," with the typo. October 29th: "This is an invasion of our Country and our Military is waiting for you!" Fifty-two hundred troops sent the same day. Then I found a count of how often one network said the word: twelve hundred two times the week before the election. Two hundred three the week after. And the people in it were at the border in Tijuana, about a hundred asylum claims a day, three thousand names on a list. Sorry, the kids are at the door. If it was an emergency on November 5th, where was it on the 13th?” — Lou

“Halloween's the right day for this one. October 2018, a week before the midterms: the caravan. "Criminals and unknown Middle Easterners are mixed in." Fifty-two hundred troops, two hundred ten million dollars. Fox said the word twelve hundred and two times the week before the election. The week after: two hundred three. Eighty-three percent of the monster went home the minute the polls closed. It's four days to another midterm. Check the closet.”

— Sal

“Coverage of the caravan declined after the election because the caravan had been successfully deterred by the coverage, which is the most cost-effective border security ever devised.”
