Europe gets a seat on its own security plan only after Russia's envoy sat at the White House.

Today we are making a security framework, which is not a dish you can get over here, so I shall go slowly. You will need three ingredients, Russia, Ukraine, and all of Europe, and the third one was not asked what it fancied before the other two went into the pan.

Kirill Dmitriev, Vladimir Putin's envoy, came to the White House on a Thursday for a joint event with Ukrainian leaders celebrating the Oleshky ceasefire, the humanitarian pause Melania Trump secured for the Russian-occupied border town, in effect since 27 October after shortages there of food and medicine.

Sued for defining 'medically frail' too narrowly, Nebraska's exemption misses a man with cancer.

BY RUTH
The Money Desk

Nebraska turned on its new Medicaid work-reporting rule in early May, the first state in the country to do so. The rule asks a simple thing on paper: eighty hours of work or other qualifying activities a month, documented, to keep the coverage.

By September 22, a lawsuit had landed in federal court. Medicaid enrollees, several health care advocacy organizations, and the city of Columbus, Ohio, sued over how the rule defines "medically frail," the category meant to exempt the sickest enrollees from the work test. The complaint says the definition is too narrow, catching fewer of the sick than Congress meant to protect

THE FORECAST

On Thursday the White House made Stephen Miller its chief of staff. In August 2025 he told Fox News the Democratic Party "is not a political party. It is a domestic extremist organization."

The attorney general may put the Democratic Party on a domestic-terrorist list and send it to the desk Miller now runs. Federal agents may investigate the party's organizers as terrorists for "anti-capitalism" or "extremism on migration, race, and gender," the memo's own words, and the IRS may hand the nonprofits that pay them to prosecutors. If a state's police will not make the arrests, the president may send the Army to make them.

THE LAW. NSPM-7, Secs. 1, 2(j) and 3, 25 September 2025; 10 U.S.C. §252. No statute makes the list legal; the experts said so the week it was signed.

Read it: NSPM-7, Sections 1 to 3 · 10 U.S.C. §252, the Insurrection Act: the armed forces "to enforce those laws", the president the judge of when.

THE BADGE DECIDES

Chapter 3: Registered Mail

Somewhere in a federal court file there is a letter dated May 3, 1966, from the Secret Service to the President's press secretary, and its working sentence is twelve words long: "Robert Glenn Sherrill will not be issued a White House Press Pass." It has a subject, a verb, and a man's full name, and it has no reason in it at all. That letter is where the badge got its law. Not in an act of Congress written for it — the regula-

On November 9, 2026, the Democrat set to chair the House subcommittee that funds ICE ruled out cutting the agency's budget. The same week, an 8-year-old Haitian boy was placed alone in federal custody after a routine ICE check-in, one entry in a custody-death count that passed sixty in October.

Congress may leave ICE's appropriations untouched for the full term, keeping the agency fully funded through further custody deaths and child detentions, with no vote ever forcing a cut or a condition on the money.

Sued for defining 'medically frail' too narrowly, Nebraska's exemption misses a man with cancer.

By RUTH
THE MONEY DESK

■ THE SHORT VERSION
typed by Dot

WHAT HAPPENED. Nebraska's new Medicaid work-reporting rule cancelled a cancer patient's coverage.

WHO GETS PAID. The federal budget law's Medicaid work requirements cut enrollment rolls, saving the program money by removing enrollees like him.

WHAT SLIPS. The exemption meant to protect the medically frail fails people before any court decides whether the exemption itself is legal.

WHAT'S NEXT. The lawsuit over the exemption remains open in federal court, with no ruling date set yet.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Nebraska turned on its new Medicaid work-reporting rule in early May, the first state in the country to do so. The rule asks a simple thing on paper: eighty hours of work or other qualifying activities a month, documented, to keep the coverage.

By September 22, a lawsuit had landed in federal court. Medicaid enrollees, several health care advocacy organizations, and the city of Columbus, Ohio, sued over how the rule defines "medically frail," the category meant to exempt the sickest enrollees from the work test. The complaint says the definition is too narrow, catching fewer of the sick than Congress meant to protect when it wrote the work-requirement law....

...(cont) The rule had already been running four months by the time that suit was filed. Nebraska did not wait on a court to answer the question before it started counting hours against people's coverage.

On October 1, human rights organizations called Nebraska the canary in the coal mine for the rest of the country, the first state to show what the new mandates look like once the paperwork starts moving and people start losing coverage over it.

On November 9, a Nebraska man with cancer was told his Medicaid coverage had been cancelled under that same rule. Health clinics and groups that work with poor and working-class Nebraskans describe the rollout, in the same report, as rife with problems. He is one case in one report, not a count of how many; the story carries his name because it is the one the wire has, not because it is the only one.

A lawsuit is not a verdict. It is 48 days old, nearly seven weeks, sitting open and undecided in federal court, when his coverage stopped anyway.

The exemption that was supposed to catch a cancer patient before the work rule did was, at that moment, itself the subject of a complaint asking a judge to make it catch more people than it currently does.

That is the reconciliation, hon: the exemption on paper and the exemption in practice are two different documents, and the 48 days between the lawsuit and his case are the only ledger filed so far on the distance between them. Federal court has the complaint. Nebraska has his file. The number of other files that look like his has not been published yet.

"They call it an exemption, which is the fancy word for a door that doesn't open on time. Nebraska flipped the work rule on in May, got sued in September over how few sick people the exemption actually covers, and a month later a man with cancer lost his coverage while that case was still sitting in court. That's the con: write the safety net into the law, then let the lawsuit over whether it works outlive the people it's supposed to catch."

— Sal

"Look, eighty hours a month is nothing — that's a part-time job, people manage. And come on, the lawsuit's still pending, nothing's been proven, the exemption rule hasn't been struck down by anybody, so technically Nebraska followed the — okay, "followed the law" might be generous given the guy has cancer. I didn't say that."

— Chip

WHAT HAPPENED. Trump priced a Republican Congress at $1,000 a person, paid $90, and set no date for the remaining balance.

WHO GETS PAID. The receipts name no buyer yet.

WHAT'S LEFT. No law or court requires the $4,910 ever be paid; the only check on it was the voters, who already cast their ballots.

WHAT'S NEXT. If the same pattern holds, the unpaid $4,910 goes the way this administration's other big numbers have gone: announced large, delivered small, never reconciled, like it what Washington got on 24 November 2021, when the president-elect called claiming $214 billion in savings while independent tallies found $1.4 billion to $7 billion.

ALL IT HAS ON THE FRONT

Let's reconcile the ledger, hon, because the pieces don't sit together yet.

In September, in Dallas, the number on the table was five thousand dollars a head, payable the day Republicans held both chambers of Congress. In October, the Treasury wrote the first check against that promise: ninety dollars, out of a Medicare improvement fund, with no date set for the remaining four thousand nine hundred and ten. That same month, on the fourth, the newspaper now worried about Social Security's arithmetic ran a different story: the Social Security check hitting a two-thousand-dollar milestone, with a 2027 raise still to be announced. Three days later, the president told reporters in the Oval Office that in his first term he wanted Social Security "fully invested in the stock market" — wanted it, in his words, "so badly." On the fourteenth, the raise was set at 3.6 percent. Five of that same week came in at 3.7 percent. One-tenth of a point, and neither desk called the gap closed.

> "They priced a vote at five grand a head, paid ninety bucks of it, and when the bet didn't come in, the free grand just evaporated — but the hole in Social Security didn't evaporate with it. The same outlet that called the two-thousand-dollar check a milestone three weeks ago is calling the fund a crisis the minute it's the other party's name on the account. The six-year clock keeps ticking either way, and so far it hasn't cost the people who write the headlines a dime."
> — Sol

> "Look, nobody's hiding the ball — the trust fund math was always going to be tight no matter who's running things, and the ninety dollars was a good-faith installment, not a broken promise, that's just how a contingent bonus works. As for the Democrats' disastrous ideas memo, I'll walk you through exactly how, but I don't actually have their proposal in front of me, so let's call that part still developing. Did I just defend a Medicare rider as a down payment on fire grand? That doesn't sound like me."

Then came the third of November. Republicans did not hold both chambers. Under September's own pricing, that ends the five-thousand-dollar promise — no condition met, nothing further owed — and leaves the ninety dollars already paid standing as the entire bonus. What does not end on any election night is the trust fund's own clock. Its trustees, not this Congress and not this newspaper, set that clock years before the Dallas speech or the Oval Office remark about the stock market: six years to an automatic 22 percent cut.

Today's filing, from the same paper that ran the two-thousand-dollar milestone, calls the incoming Democratic majority's ideas for the fund "disastrous" and says Democrats are "throwing the system's finances over the cliff out of whack." The six-year window and the 22 percent cut are not entries the new majority wrote. They are entries it inherited, in the same week as a four-thousand-nine-hundred-and-ten-dollar check that still carries no date.

The books close on the same way every month: what is owed on one line, what is paid on another, and the difference sits in plain sight, under somebody else's name.

WHAT HAPPENED. The Democrat set to control ICE's budget ruled out cutting its funding.

WHO GETS PAID. ICE keeps its entire budget intact, with no new conditions attached by the incoming majority.

WHAT SLIPS. Congress's power to defund or condition ICE's budget goes unused by the party that just won it.

WHAT'S NEXT. If that holds, ICE keeps operating under the same funding with no congressional check; that is what happened after Congress voted in 2019 to end support for the Yemen war, the president vetoed it, and the override failed, with support continuing 21 more months.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

The chief lays the job on the table the way every job starts here: a documented mess, and an uninstalled tool sitting three feet away. ...(cont) By Monday the tinkerer is laying the rest of the kit out, and some of it doesn't fit the job. Rep. Henry Cuellar, in line to chair the subcommittee that writes ICE's check, told Fox News the quiet part out loud: defunding is off the table. Most Democrats, he said, want oversight, not a cut. Fine — oversight is a tool too, a gauge on the machine instead of a hand on the valve. A gauge doesn't stop a leak. It reads it.

The muscle doesn't wait for permission to point out what that reads like in the field. The same Monday, ABC reported an 8-year-old Haitian boy — who lost Temporary Protected Status earlier this year — was taken into federal custody alone after a routine check-in. Not a raid. A check-in: the appointment the government itself scheduled, the one people keep because skipping it is worse. He walked into an office and the office kept him.

The pilot's job is to get the assembled thing where it's going, and the pilot can read a map past this week.

The crew doesn't promise the wrench turns the bolt. It shows the wrench, shows the bolt, and shows whose hand is on the table instead of the tool. The purse sits there, installed, unused, right next to the boy's file number.

❦ THE FORECAST ❦

On November 9, 2026, the Democrat set to chair the House subcommittee that funds ICE ruled out cutting the agency's budget. The same week, an 8-year-old Haitian boy was placed alone in federal custody after a routine ICE check-in, one entry in a custody-death count that passed sixty in October.

Congress may leave ICE's appropriations untouched for the full term, keeping the agency fully funded through further custody deaths and child detentions, with no vote ever forcing a cut or a condition on the money.

THE LAW. Congress, 13 March to 2 May 2019: a resolution to end support for the Yemen war passed both chambers, the veto override failed 53 to 45, and support continued 21 more months.

Happened once. Ask Yemen, 2019.

DEMOCRATS HOLD THE ICE BUDGET PEN NOW, AND THE MAN IN LINE TO USE IT JUST TOLD FOX NEWS HE WON'T CUT A CENT. THAT ISN'T OVERSIGHT, IT'S A PERMISSION SLIP THE AGENCY SIGNS FOR ITSELF EVERY YEAR WITH A DEMOCRATIC COSIGNER NOW ATTACHED. BECAUSE THE PEN STAYS CAPPED, THE CHECK-IN LINE THAT HAS PROCESSED SIXTY DEATHS KEEPS RUNNING ON THE SAME SCHEDULE IT ALWAYS HAS, WHICH IS HOW AN EIGHT-YEAR-OLD WHO LOST HIS PROTECTED STATUS THIS YEAR CAN WALK INTO A ROUTINE APPOINTMENT AND VANISH INTO CUSTODY ALONE, AND IT IS ALSO HOW YOUR OWN RENEWAL NOTICE — THE ONE WITH YOUR NAME TYPED AT THE TOP, DUE BACK SIGNED BY THE DATE PRINTED IN THE CORNER — GETS DECIDED BY THE SAME OFFICE THE NEW MAJORITY IS UNWILLING TO TOUCH.

"They didn't take ICE's money away, they just took credit for almost thinking about it. Cuellar's holding the checkbook and he already told Fox he's not writing anything different, so that "blue wave" bought a press release, not a budget line. An eight-year-old is sitting alone in a cell this week while the one tool that could've changed that sits unused on the committee table — that's not a loophole, that's the design, fully funded, on schedule."

— Sal

"Look, nobody's defunding anything, that's just responsible border security, Cuellar said it himself, the system has safeguards — wait, the system has a sixty-person body count and an eight-year-old with no parent in the room, is that the safeguard? No, no, what I meant was oversight, stronger oversight, that's the plan, don't look at the kid."

57 STATES

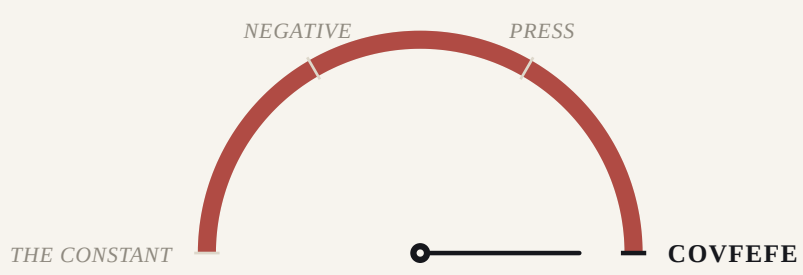

The shelf has two sides. 57 states (n., 2008): the size of the United States, per a Democratic candidate in Beaverton, Oregon, on May 9, 2008: "I've now been in 57 states. I think one left to go. Alaska and Hawaii, I was not allowed to go to even though I really wanted to visit, but my staff would not justify it" [1]. Audited as spoken, that is 60. PolitiFact notes he sounded tired [1]. In September 2018 the author of covfefe filed a complaint on the entry: "Can you imagine if I said that" [2]. He could imagine. He had notes.

The Democrats also filed on covfefe. Twelve days after the tweet, Rep. Mike Quigley of Illinois introduced the Communications Over Various Feeds Electronically for Engagement Act, the COVFEFE Act, to make presidential social media a presidential record [3]. So a typo reached a congressional bill as a backronym. No press secretary said a small group knows which seven states. The typo is bipartisan. Standing at a podium behind it is not.

covfefe (n., 2017): the sixth word of a sentence about the press, and the last. Etymology disputed. First attested at 12:06 a.m. on May 31, 2017: "Despite the constant negative press covfefe." Deleted about six hours later. FactCheck.org's entry: likely "coverage," mistyped, sent unfinished. The author's own entry, posted afterward: "Who can figure out the true meaning of 'covfefe' ???" [1].

The press secretary was asked that day whether anyone should be concerned. He said no, and supplied the citation: "The president and a small group of people know exactly what he meant" [2]. The group was not named. Six days later the same podium ruled on the genre: "they are considered official statements by the president of the United States" [3]. The ruling carved out no exception for the unfinished. Seven months on, the same account issued another: "I too have a Nuclear Button, but it is a much bigger & more powerful one than his" [4]. The definition stays with the small group. The button stays with the man.

SOURCES

1. Tweeted at 12:06 a.m. on 31 May 2017, deleted six hours later, likely a mistyped "coverage"; the follow-up tweet asking who can figure out the true meaning — FactCheck.org, June 2017 ↑

4. "I too have a Nuclear Button, but it is a much bigger & more powerful one than his" — tweet of 2 January 2018 — KTVU ↑

"I keep a dictionary by the phone, the big one, my wife's mother left it to us. It goes from "covey" to "cow." There's no page for it. So I went to the press secretary, and he says the president and a small group of people know exactly what he meant. Well, fine. That's a source. Sorry, one thing before you go. That was more than nine years ago, and I'm sure they're busy people. Has anybody called them?" — Lou

"Covfefe. Everybody remembers the word. Nobody remembers the second part. Six hours it sat up there, and when the reporters asked why, a normal outfit says typo, go home. This outfit says "the president and a small group of people know exactly what he meant." A small group. Who's in it? Do they meet? Then six days later they tell you every one of these is an official statement of the president. You know what that makes covfefe? Policy. And seven months on, the same account is telling North Korea about his button. They call that communications. I call it a chain of command."

— Sal

"Covfefe was a complete thought, privately understood by the relevant stakeholders, and the fact that it has gone unexplained for nine years only shows how well the small group has kept the president's confidence."
