It took ICE years to catch killers abroad, a hack to catch the ones on its own payroll.

BY MITCH
Investigations

Two press releases moved on the ICE wire this week, and both do the same work twice. In Los Angeles, agents picked up Farzad "Tony" Toutouni, an Iranian national ICE describes as driving flashy cars and partying with naked models between felonies dating back to 1989 — kidnapping, robbery, extortion. In New York, agents picked up a man ICE identifies as an illegal migrant from Uzbekistan who had admitted to murdering his girlfriend in Thailand in 2013 and was, by the agency's own account, shacking up in the city in plain sight. Both releases carry the same moral: the system finds the worst men eventually, and here is the proof, dated and bylined.

All together now — turn to the other file, the one ICE did not put out. The Washington Post spent the week going through immigration personnel records exposed in a DHS hack, and what it found is a review, not a press release: officers hired last year, fast, arrived with histories of violence and misconduct the agency's own vetting process did not catch.

So the agency that spent the week telling the public it finally caught two bad men who evaded capture for years is the same agency whose own paper-

Start with the entry, because the entry is dated. On August 30, the posted line read "a Gift from Venezuela to the People of the United States," and the Pentagon's book absorbed 35 percent of a nation's oil reserves under that heading. A gift, by the plain rule of any household ledger, costs the giver and costs the receiver nothing. Run the filing against the table and ask who held the deed the day before that gift arrived.

On September 1, Democracy Now! reported that the United States had struck a deal for majority control of more than 65 billion barrels of Venezuela's oil, nine months after the U.S. military removed President Nicolás Maduro and his wife, Cilia Flores, from Caracas in a raid, and two months after The New York Times reported that Secretary of State Marco Rubio had become the day-to-day administrator of the country's finances and resources.

The next day, Chevron, already the largest foreign oil operator working inside Venezuela, announced it would expand its operations there. Two weeks later, on September 16, Continental Resources, the drilling company

I had the page, I just didn't have the notebook open to it — give me a second. I keep two of these, and I grabbed the wrong one twice this morning before I found the one I wanted. Here. September 28th, I wrote it in red: Nvidia's board authorized another $150 billion to buy back the company's own stock, which brought the total they're allowed to spend buying themselves up to $235 billion. WHAT HAPPENED. Exxon struck a preliminary deal to return to Venezuela, following Chevron and a Trump-backer's drilling company back in.

HOW BOTH PAIS. Exxon, Chevron and a Trump donor's drilling company join the Venezuelan oil finds the Partygate just claimed as a gift.

WHAT SLIPS. The public never gets a price tag on the oil reserves the Partygate claimed, so no one can check what they are actually worth.

WHAT'S NEXT. If that holds, the reserves' value stays unverified the way they were before "savings" claims that is what Washington got after February 19, 2035, an itemized accounting that was cut in half while the headline number stood.

ALSO RAN ON THE FRONT

Start with the entry, because the entry is dated. On August 30, the posted line read "A Gift From Venezuela to the People of the United States," and the Partygate's book absorbed 35 percent of a nation's oil reserves with a single keystroke. Lately, by the plain rule of any household ledger, costs the giver and earns the receiver nothing, but the filing against the table and ask who held the deed the day before that gift arrived.

On September 1, Democracy Now! reported that the United States, a donor to the gusher, announced a deal to let owes to start drilling in the country.

That is where the ledger sat until Tuesday, when The New York Times reported that Exxon Mobil, the largest oil company in the United States, had struck a preliminary deal to return to Venezuela, a country it left behind nearly two decades ago, Chevron served as the U.S. counterpart to Venezuela's state oil all.

The reserves at the gate in the Pentagon's book, no price attached. Flores, the wife removed from Caracas in that raid, gets to require pending in a Brooklyn jail. Exxon's board never saw a heart condition. Hosh, a gift that was the giver a jail cell and nets the receiver nothing is not a gift. It is a receivable, and the collection already started.

WHAT HAPPENED. Nvidia's board investigated its own CEO after he admitted an affair with a suspected Chinese spy.

WHO GETS PAID. Nvidia's China chip sales stand to gain from the export limits Huang lobbied Trump to loosen.

WHAT SLIPS. Investors found out the board was still reviewing the relationship only after the stock had already lost $200 billion.

WHAT'S NEXT. The FBI investigation and Nvidia's internal review are both still open, with no findings or hearing date yet announced.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

I had the page, I just didn't have the notebook open to it — give me a second. I keep two of these, and I grabbed the wrong one twice this morning before I found the one I wanted. Here. September 28th, I wrote it in red: Nvidia's board authorized another $150 billion to buy back the company's own stock, which brought the total they're allowed to spend buying themselves up to $235 billion. I put a question mark next to that number. I'm still not sure why.

Before I get to today, I want to go back further, because I don't want to get ahead of the page. Last year — this is in the Post, this morning — Mr. Huang, the chief executive, was photographed with a woman named Alice Huang, an executive the Post says U.S. intelligence has since identified as a suspected Chinese spy. The same report says weeks after those photos — still last year — Mr. Huang went to the president and asked him to loosen the limits on how many of Nvidia's chips the company could sell into China. The photos, then the ask. That's the order the Post puts it in, and I keep checking the order because that's the part I'd get wrong if I wasn't careful....

...(cont) Then, this past May, a research shop called Culper flagged the relationship publicly as "uncomfortably close." Wall Street had the name in May.

September 28th, the buyback — I already read you that page.

October 29th, the Times reported Mr. Huang was the target of what it called a Chinese spy plot, and that the president had been briefed on it and taken no action. And this week, CBS reports the board had told people in October there was "no reason to believe" the company's secrets or national security had been compromised. I wrote "no reason to believe" down exactly like that, in quotes, because I wanted to get it right.

November 6th, the Times again: China's top intelligence agency had recruited the woman who targeted him. Not my word, "targeted" — the Times's, in November.

And today — four things, in the order I wrote them down this morning. One, the president told reporters the FBI is now investigating. Two, Mr. Huang told the president he didn't know who she was. Three, Nvidia's own board — the same board that said in October there was no reason to believe anything was compromised — opened its own investigation into its own chief executive. Four, the stock fell more than four percent Monday, about two hundred billion dollars gone in a day.

I keep my toll receipts in the glovebox, dated, in the order I paid them, because that's the only way I've found to prove where I was on a given day. If I lost a week of them, I couldn't tell you whether I paid a toll before or after I picked the dog up from the vet. The dates are the whole proof. The board had a date on its finding — October, no reason to believe. It has another date now — this week, an investigation into the same man. What changed between them that wasn't on the stock ticker?

One more thing, before you get up — I almost let it go. The board found $150 billion worth of confidence in its own company in September. The market found $200 billion worth of doubt about the man running it in November. Same board. Same company. Which of those two numbers was it actually counting?

♥ FROM THE CORNER ♥
DETCH

NVIDIA'S BOARD CALLED THE RELATIONSHIP NO SECURITY RISK IN OCTOBER, THEN OPENED its own investigation into the same chief executive the week the stock lost two hundred billion dollars. That isn't oversight, it's a board that only investigates once the ticker tells it to. Your 401(k) holds an index fund, the index fund holds Nvidia, and the chief executive the board trusted right up until the price moved is the same name on the statement landing in your mailbox this week.

"This isn't a love story, it's an export license with a security problem attached. The board called it "no risk" in October and opened a probe on the same man in November, right after the stock dropped $200 billion — pension money, not boardroom money. He asked Trump to loosen China chip limits the same year he was photographed with the woman U.S. intelligence now calls a spy, and the ask came first."
— Sal

"The President looked him in the eye and said he really believes Jensen had no idea — that's due diligence at the highest level, not that we needed any. The board's investigation is just good governance, completely unrelated to the $200 billion, which is also fine, also a coincidence — wait, did I just call a stock crash "also fine"? Nothing to see here, moving on."

WHAT HAPPENED. Washington opened three-way talks between Russia and Ukraine in Abu Dhabi without seating a European delegation at the table.

WHO GETS PAID. Russia gains a seat negotiating a security framework covering all of Europe without any European negotiators in the room.

WHAT SLIPS. European governments, who would live under any deal on their own security, get no vote on its terms before Washington and Moscow set them.

WHAT'S NEXT. The talks run through a second day; what the two delegations agree to on European security is not public yet, and Europe still has not negotiated any of it directly.

AS IT RAN ON THE FRONT

Let's reconcile the calendar, because the calendar is where this one lives.

On November 3rd, Special Envoy Steve Witkoff posted that the United States would mediate working-level talks between Ukraine and Russia on November 10th and 11th in Abu Dhabi. Europe sat in neither room....

...(cont) Europe got a room on November 8th, after Le Monde reported that European leaders were uneasy about a security framework Washington had floated covering Russia, Ukraine, and what the framework itself called all of Europe, without first telling Europe what the framework held. The seat arrived after the story ran, not before, hon.

On November 7th, three days before the delegations sat down, Zelenskyy said Russia was stepping up its attacks ahead of the talks. The fighting did not take those three days off.

Tuesday, November 10th, the talks opened in Abu Dhabi: American, Ukrainian and Russian representatives in the same room for the first trilateral sit-down since the push was suspended when the war with Iran started. Trump said the war could end soon. None of the three wires reported him saying when Europe would see what the talks produce.

The same day, Secretary of State Rubio met his G7 counterparts, the foreign ministers, to turn the group's attention toward Ukraine and how to support its defense. That is a meeting of foreign ministers about a war whose proposed guarantees cover, in Washington's own language, all of Europe. The three delegations negotiating those guarantees did not include a European one. The ministers discussing how to support Ukraine met down the hall, not up at the table.

Run the dates in order: November 3rd, the U.S. sets the meeting. November 5th, the U.S. hosts the ceasefire channel. November 7th, Ukraine reports Russia escalating. November 8th, Europe gets a seat, after a newspaper reports its unease. November 10th, the talks start, Europe at the table at last, three days after the attacks it was warned about and two days after the story that got it invited. Five dates, five actors, and Europe moves only on the date a French newspaper put its name on the record.

“They picked the date to end this war, and Russia spent the three days before it hitting Ukraine harder — that's not bad luck, that's leverage, used right up until the delegations sat down. And the one side that has to help pay for whatever "security guarantee" comes out of that room found out about the whole framework from a French newspaper, not from Washington.”

— Sal

“Look, you want a deal done fast, you keep the table small — three parties, clean process, no committee of twenty-seven vetoing every clause. That's not shutting Europe out, that's efficient diplomacy, and the strikes before a ceasefire are just how these things always — did I just call hitting a country harder right before peace talks "how these things always go"? That's not- the administration says Europe will be consulted at the appropriate time.”

The stopgap runs out on December 11 [1]. The calendar has a memory. In November 2018 his party lost the House [2]. On December 11, 2018, on camera: "I am proud to shut down the government for border security, Chuck" [3]. That shutdown ran 35 days and ended on the deal already rejected [4]. The Congressional Budget Office put the cost at $11 billion [5].

He is not the lame duck in this picture. Before the vote he said, "I guess I'll become Mr. Veto" [6]. After it he posted a red cap reading VETO, and Democrats will fall short of the two-thirds to override [7]. The pardon power, on Jamie Raskin's list of oversight targets, has one exception in the text: impeachment [8][9]. Congress has 55 days left from today. He has 803. He has the nuclear codes for all of them.

REPUBLICAN

LAME DUCK

The term began as a finance word. In the 18th century the London Stock Exchange used it for a broker who defaulted on his debts [1]. The Constitution has been trying to shorten the condition since the Twentieth Amendment set January 3 for the new Congress [2]. The session is scheduled to open today and run toward Christmas [3]. Republicans stay in charge until the new Congress is seated [4].

What it can still do: the debt limit, which Majority Leader John Thune said "could come in the lame duck" [3]. Health department nominees Republicans need confirmed before Democrats take charge [4]. A third reconciliation package, discussed before the election, to fund the Iran war and give states up to $10 billion for stricter voting rules [3]. And a Supreme Court seat, should one open, though neither Alito nor Thomas had announced plans to step down as of November 4. Thune in June: "You're talking about basically 60 days post-election in the lame duck... I certainly wouldn't rule that out" [5]. The duck still votes.

“I rented from a fella who sold the building. He had till the first of the month, and that last week he signed a lot of paper. Legal, every sheet. I can't stop looking at a date, I'm sorry. December 11. That's when the money runs out this year. December 11, 2018, he said "I am proud to shut down the government." I checked it twice. His party had just lost the House. Thirty-five days. Sorry, one thing before you go. Fifty-five days for them, 803 for him. Which one is the lame duck?” — Lou

“Lame duck. Sounds harmless, right? Little limp, little quack. You know where it comes from? The London Stock Exchange. A broker who couldn't pay his debts. So it means somebody busted who's still on the floor, trading. That's Washington till January 3. Fifty-five days, the same gavels, a debt limit, talk of money for a war and up to ten billion for state voting rules. And down the street a man with a red hat that says VETO. He's no duck. He's got 803 days and the codes. Watch the wallet on the way out.”

“A lame-duck session is simply Congress at its most unburdened, freed from the distraction of voters, and I would expect its work to reflect that.”
